Excerpt: . . . though skilled, were proverbially low paid, he replied that they were an exception and not important enough to count. The truth was, of course, that his statement was not a law at all, but a mere rule--a general statement of facts as they happen to exist, not an explanation of them. The so-called practical man takes his stand on rules, the scientist abides by principles. This is the great distinction between them and this is why they so little comprehend each other. The practical man has to do with events. Events or phenomena are the result of laws acting in combination. It is the business of the theorist to extricate and study these laws separately. The practical man finds the concrete fact, a synthesis of the numerous forces behind them. The scientist is bent on analysis. We all know how the synthesis of laws in concrete cases present a confused and seething mass without apparent rhyme or reason like the Niagara whirlpool. It is small wonder that the practical man, like the captain of the Maid of The Mist, wending his way through such a chaos should frame rough generalizations to guide him and should mistake these practical rules for scientific laws. On the other hand the pure theorist, sticking to some single isolated principle, is naturally at a loss when he attempts to apply it to the actual world. The former makes of science a sorry hodge-podge. The latter makes of practice a...
