That they exert besides a local irritation, capable of producing inflammation more or less violent. 7th. That they appear to act on the human species as on dogs. The Aconitum Cammarum, Monk s Hood, is possessed of a flavour more acrid than the preceding, and of extremely energetic properties. Mathiolus relates, that a criminal condemned to death, ate some of the root of this plant. He perceived a tolerably strong flavour of pepper, and at the end of two hours was seized with vertiges, and commotions of the brain so violent, that he thought his head full of boiling water; a general swelling of the whole body took place; the countenance livid; the eyes were out of their sockets: the unfortunate man finally died in most horrible convulsions., We find in the Sepukhretum of Bonetus, and in the Memoires de YAcademie de Suede, facts similar to the preceding. Formerly arrows were poisoned with the juice of this plant. The Aconitum Anthora appears also to be poisonous. Hoffman says, that it overturns the stomach, and occasions a burning heat accompanied with thirst and anguish about...
